In June, San Diego City College opened its newest building, the Early Education Center (EEC) that will not only educate students studying child development but also provide childcare for students with children.

The center supports City College’s Child Development program, which offers core courses leading to associate degrees in child development and elementary teacher education for transfer to four-year colleges and universities. The new 10,000-square-foot center provides child development classrooms for infant, toddler, and preschool children; faculty and staff support spaces; a kitchen; a lobby and reception area; and a faculty conference room. It also includes an expansive playground space and outdoor learning areas.

“These students are going to be parents, and this is very important for them,” said student Pearla Herrera, whose toddler is enrolled in the preschool program.

Approximately $900,000 in Proposition S was allocated to the Early Education Center project; the remainder of the $12.5 million budget utilized City of San Diego redevelopment funding.
